Boundary Script Builder

Level 4 · Communication and Boundaries

Name _____ Date _____

Many capable professionals struggle less with knowing their limits and more with saying them out loud. The words do not come in the moment, so you say yes, and resent it later. This exercise helps you prepare the words in advance. When you already know what you will say, holding a boundary takes far less courage.

Clear is kind. Unclear is unkind, to them and to you.

PART 1 Where You Need a Boundary

Start with one situation that keeps draining your time, energy, or confidence.

The situation

Who is involved, and what keeps happening?

What usually happens when you do not hold the line

What do you say or do, and how do you feel afterwards?

What it costs you

Time, energy, money, respect, or rest.

PART 2 Define the Boundary

Be specific. Vague boundaries are hard to hold.

YOUR BOUNDARY IN ONE SENTENCE

From now on, I will …

What you will do instead

The alternative you will offer or the action you will take.

PART 3 Your Scripts

Write your own words for each moment. Use the examples as a starting point, then make them sound like you.

Saying no

Example: "Thank you for thinking of me. I am not able to take this on right now."

Pushing back

Example: "I see it differently. Can I share what I am noticing?"

Asking for what you need

Example: "To do this well, I need two more days and one decision from you."

If they push back, I will say

Calmly repeat your boundary with fewer words. Example: "I understand. My answer is still no."

PART 4 Your First Use

A boundary becomes real the first time you use it.

When and with whom will you use it first?

How will you look after yourself afterwards?

Guilt or discomfort is normal the first few times. It means you are doing something new, not something wrong.

Clear is kind. Unclear is unkind, to them and to you.
