Your Pre-Performance Routine

Level 4 · Communication and Boundaries

Name _____ Date _____

Before a presentation, an interview, or a difficult conversation, your nervous system prepares for threat. Your heart speeds up, your thinking narrows, and the critic gets louder. Elite performers do not wait to feel confident. They follow a routine that puts their body and mind in the right state, whatever they are feeling.

Confidence is not a feeling you wait for. It is a state you can create.

PART 1 The Moment

Get specific about what you are preparing for.

The moment you are preparing for

A presentation, interview, pitch, negotiation, or difficult conversation.

What your body and mind usually do beforehand

Racing thoughts, tight chest, over-rehearsing, avoiding it until the last minute.

PART 2 Your Five-Minute Routine

Five short steps. Keep each one simple enough to do in a corridor or a car.

Step 1 · Settle the body (1 minute)

For example: breathe in for 4, out for 6, five times. Drop your shoulders. Feel your feet on the floor.

Step 2 · Fire your anchor (30 seconds)

Use the anchor you created in the Anchoring exercise in this level.

Step 3 · Reframe the nerves (30 seconds)

The body signals of fear and excitement are almost identical. Tell yourself what they mean.

STEP 4 · SET ONE INTENTION (30 SECONDS)

Today, my intention is to …

Step 5 · Know your first 15 seconds (2 minutes)

Nerves peak at the start. Know exactly how you will open, then the rest will follow.

PART 3 After the Moment

A short, kind review turns every performance into practice.

How you will review it afterwards

Suggestion: one thing that worked, one thing to adjust, and one thing you are proud of.

Confidence is not a feeling you wait for. It is a state you can create.